三. 英翻中(四十分)

Like cable providers, IPTV providers must have systems that handle subscription services. Cable TV providers typically provide market segmentation via subscriptions to different program packages. Similarly, it is expected that IPTV customers will subscribe to view certain conditional access (CA) channels or channel packages. In addition, video on demand (VOD) may be authorized via a subscription or on an individual pay per rental basis. These permissions must percolate through the network, from the initial subscription ordering and billing system to the authorized device. Unlike the cable system where authorization is traditionally implemented on the set-top box, in an IP network or a switched network such authorization could be implemented at a variety of network points controlled by a network-based authentication and authorization server. Such flexibility adds to the assurance challenge but ensures that a break in the set-top box security will not completely compromise the carrier' s control over content distribution. VOD access may require authentication, authorization, and accounting (AAA) to pay for rentals. Enhanced services such as network personal video recorder (NPVR) and special converged services may require additional AAA mechanisms and may need to enable accounting for real-time transactions.
