B-2. The following paragraph is adapted from the article “Digital Video Update: YouTube, Flash, High-Definition,” which appeared in Language Learning & Technology Volume 11, No. 3, Page 16, 2007. The author is Robert Godwin-Jones.

Over the past year YouTube has become enormously popular. A recent article in Wires 16 an average of 65,000 uploads and 100 million videos viewed per day on YouTube. One might mention as further evidence the purchase of YouTube by Google for the amount of US $1.65 billion. The Wires article would like to explore some examples of the wide variety of video content available on the site. 17 through YouTube gives ample examples of that diversity. What is common to most clips is that they are 18 videos which document occurrences from the lives of non-celebrities. As such, the clips provide a huge multimedia library of real language use by real people, a potentially rich resource for language learning or corpus collections. The vast majority of clips are in English, and 19 EFL teachers have begun tapping into this source. While some provide sample lessons for students to view and discuss, others have uploaded videos of their own, with the specific goal of language learning 20. Instructors of other languages have found YouTube to be useful in language learning.

With the rapid development of the Internet-based technologies, plagiarism has been a serious problem worldwide. According to Encyclopedia Britannica Online (www.britannica.com), plagiarism is “the act of taking the writings of another person and passing them off as one's own. The fraudulence is closely related to forgery and piracy—practices generally in violation of copyright laws” and of the intellectual property. In other words, plagiarism is considered the act of borrowing someone else's idea or work without a proper citation or giving a credit to the original author. What do you think about plagiarism? How will you help yourself avoid plagiarism when you become a graduate student? (Word limit: 300 words)
