Please read the following text and choose the most appropriate answer.

Writing a Master thesis often requires a hard working attitude and excellent time management skills. However, most students do not realize the amount of effort they need to invest in such a long-term and research-oriented project. The majority of students, if not motivated enough, has a tendency to put off their thesis writings. Easily mislead by others, students misinterpret the main purpose of a graduation requirement in thesis research. Not only does a well-written thesis could serve as a strong proof of students' analytical capabilities and in-depth knowledge on specific subjects, but also a powerful representation of their accomplishment from graduate schools.

With this purpose clearly stated, students are often suggested to begin research from the first semester of their enrollment. Each semester that follows, various chapters from a thesis writing should be drafted, revised, and completed according to advisor's review. Generally speaking, students whom do not begin their thesis writing from the first semester, run a risk of not graduating on-time after a two-year study in a Master program.

Therefore, the best way to ensure a successful completion in thesis writing from graduate schools is to find an advisor as soon as admission is granted. Students may propose a few possible topics for research possibilities and follow instructions from their advisors.
