An American university is organized into many departments, such as English and Economics. Among the professors in each department, one is chosen to be department chair. The head of the entire university is called the president. Many people who want to have a university career begin teaching even before they have earned their Ph.D. As teaching assistants, they may teach low-level course while completing their own studies. Their goal, of course, is to become a full professor, but this may take many years. After completing their Ph.D., many faculty members begin as instructors, teaching on a yearly contract, while some are fortunate enough to obtain a position as an assistant professor. This puts them on the 'tenure track'—the academic ladder that leads to a lifelong position. The next step, reached after several years, is associate professor. In order to receive tenure, and a permanent appointment as a professor, candidates must carry out significant research and publish scholarly papers. (ACTIVE 4)

What academic titles does each of these people hold according to the passage? Choose the best answer.

1. Harold is the head of twenty professors of Economics.
(A) president (B) department chair (C) instructor (D) teaching assistant
